

Live Life to the Fullest!

One might think perhaps that I am too confident. Or that I am too communicative of my private history, and it may well be. So my treatise is to think aloud, while my writing is to think in ink (and I follow my own humors in each case). Sometimes it slows me down to consider who is listening to me - and if I stop to consider what is proper to be said to each next person (and thus, differently), I then come to doubt whether any part of it all is proper to be said at all.

The fact is, I have sometimes found myself at a distance of ten or fifteen and even twenty years ahead of the times (within the scope of my ideas and certain predictions that I'd documented - many of which came to be), and presuppose myself to be writing to those who will be interested about those things hereafter. (Is it not human to wish to have some record of time? And the entire history of which, no one can know but one's self). So, I do and learn everything as dutifully and as fully as I am able (within the bounds of the dynamism that I am capable of expending each day).

For... like the rose, beauty fades, and like the mundane, dumb is forever."

"Short time to live, long time to stay dead."

Copyright ©2000-2003 - Robert C. Kuhmann - All rights reserved.